SINGAPORE SINGEING

By PAUL DEAN

THE ship moved slow Singapore way. The Malay Peninsula was a green blur on the horizon.

Sergeant Jack Dalton was not interested in either shore. He was in the ship's hospital, and he was feeling very sorry for himself. He had been in a fight with one of the members of the crew, and he had come off second best.

Dalton was a tough man in a tough service.

He had been used to not having much sleep, and he had been used to not having much comfort, but he had never been used to being knocked out by a man who was not a member of the Army.

He had been knocked out by a man who was not a member of the Army, who rather like me for a thing, in the first place, and who had then proceeded to knock him out cold and hard for the thing. Pleasant.

"Where's that fellow Ginger?" he asked Sergeant-Major Cannon after he had come to. "Where's that fellow Ginger Jones?"

"Ginger Jones is in the brig," said the sergeant-major. "He's in irons, and he's going to be court-martialled."

"Court-martialled!" he said, and the sergeant-major nodded. "Court-martialled for knocking me out? Court-martialled for knocking me out in a fair fight, and in self-defence? Court-martialled for knocking me out when I was trying to knock him out?"

"Court-martialled for knocking you out," said the sergeant-major.

"Court-martialled for knocking me out!" said Dalton. "Court-martialled for knocking me out when I was trying to knock him out! Court-martialled for knocking me out in a fair fight, and in self-defence! Court-martialled for knocking me out when I was trying to knock him out!"

"Court-martialled for knocking you out," said the sergeant-major.

"Court-martialled!" said Dalton. "Court-martialled for knocking me
